The mammals are discussed species by species, with the taxonomic, historical, and biological data that are available. These are scanty in some cases, plentiful in others. Attention is given to interactions between species, changes in habits, responses to and effects on the new environment, and economic significance. There follows a section on "Some perspectives in Hawaiian mammalogy," dealing with such special topics as Hawaiian names for mammals, mammals in crafts and art, whales and dolphins, biological aspects of the rodents, diseases and parasites, current introductions, the fate of Kahoolawe, and the Leeward archipelago. It is surprising that, despite the limited fauna and the general lack of interest in it until recent years, the author has assembled in the last section a bibliography of 86 pages with 771 annotated references bearing on the subject. An adequate index completes this interesting and informative volume, published in observance of the 80th anniversary of the founding of the Bernice P. Bishop Museum in 1889.

RICHARD H. MANVILLE
Bureau of Sport Fisheries and Wildlife, Washington, D.C.

Sedimentary Compounds

Organic Geochemistry. Methods and Results. G. EGLINTON and M. T. J. MURPHY, Eds. Springer-Verlag, New York, 1969. xxiv + 828 pp., illus. $49.

Sedimentary rocks contain the earth's largest pool of organic compounds; 1 percent of a typical sediment consists of an immensely complex assemblage of compounds that reflect both earlier life and the slow but powerful chemical reactions in the subsurface. Organic geochemistry is the study of this material and the interpretation of its structure in terms of the processes that shaped it.

The size of the present book, the number of contributors, and the quality of the papers mirror the present state and the healthy growth of the field. Organic geochemistry has grown under three different stimuli: academic curiosity, petroleum research, and preparation for extraterrestrial sampling. Yet only two of the 31 chapters have been contributed by scientists in the oil industry. A large fraction of the industrial effort during a quarter century remains classified and lost to science.

The papers fall into four groups: on methods, on geological processes, on inventory of compounds, and on specific geological situations. The methods section emphasizes the modern tools, especially mass spectrometry. Some chapters could be more effective; the short section on gas chromatography is too elementary, with only two pages on geochemical use. Some statements are painfully misleading: "Pesticide grade solvents are contamination free" (p. 77).

The section on geological processes should be valuable for chemists entering the field; I regret that the vital chapter "Organic matter in sediments" was not expanded beyond a brief outline and five references. The inventory of compounds and the analysis of geological situations reflect the uneven penetration of the field by modern techniques; these are applied to small molecules but have had little impact on the study of humic acids, coal, and kerogen. The imbalance is great; we are ignorant about the structures of most sedimentary organic compounds.

Organic reactions in sediments are incredibly complex. A single biochemical may be converted into many thousands of different compounds. We will not understand the origin of oil, coal, and kerogen until we understand the reactions that occur in sediments. Yet, a single chapter of the book discusses some possible reactions, and the excellent subject index has no entries for equilibrium, mechanism, radical, or reaction.

We miss some subjects that might be covered in a future addition to this book: history and development of thoughts, areas of controversy, pitfalls in research and interpretation (meteorites!), trends and needs for future growth, links and contrasts between inorganic and organic geochemistry, and applications. Organic geochemistry does have applications, most obviously in petroleum exploration, and also in oceanography, public health, and pollution research, a subject that need not have been covered by a tendentious poem, as it is in this book.

On the whole this is an excellent book, a good reflection of the state of the art, in spite of three years' production time, and useful to students and specialists; but not an imaginative outlook into the future, and with a price tag that may limit the market.

MAX BLUMER
Woods Hole Oceanographic Institution, Woods Hole, Massachusetts

A Solid

Physics of Ice. Proceedings of an international symposium, Munich, Sept. 1968. NIKOLAUS RIEHL, BERNHARD BULLEMER, and HERMANN ENGELHARDT, Eds. Plenum, New York, 1969. xx + 644 pp., illus. $25.

Gränicher, in his review "Problems of the physics of ice," the first of the 56 papers in this volume, relates a story about the visit of a distinguished American scientist to his laboratory in Zurich. The visitor expressed astonishment that Gränicher had chosen to study ice, a substance about which surely everything is known. This volume effectively dispels that notion; it also catalogs in detail much of the recent work on the structure and properties of ice, and it emphasizes by means of several review articles the importance of achieving a thorough understanding of ice.

A group of eight papers covers the crystal structure and growth of ice. These papers remind us that ordinary ice I is only one of at least ten solid forms of H_2O. The others include the high pressure ices (II through IX) and the metastable cubic ice and vitreous ice that can be formed by condensing water vapor at low temperatures. Whalley, Hamilton, Kamb, Rabideau, and others summarize the structural conclusions that have emerged from their studies of x-ray and neutron diffraction, infrared and Raman spectroscopy, nuclear magnetic resonance, and dielectric and thermodynamic measurements. In all ices studied to date, each molecule is hydrogen bonded to four near (2.75 to 2.87 Å) neighbors. Within the limits of the measurements, individual H_2O molecules are not deformed from their dimensions in the vapor, though hydrogen bonds in some of the ices are deformed considerably from the nearly linear O-H. . .O bond in ice I. In ice IX the departure from linearity is as great as 15 degrees. The greater compactness of the high pressure ices is the result of the closer approach of non-hydrogen-bonded neighbors; this is achieved in most cases through the bending of hydrogen bonds. The ices differ in the degree of order of the orientations of the molecules. In ices II, VIII, and IX, the orientations have a long-range order, whereas in ices I, III, V, VI, VII, and cubic ice they are disordered.

A total of 21 papers are grouped under the headings Electrical Properties and Diffusion and Relaxation Phenomena. Many of these are attempts to interpret properties such as dielectric relaxation, conductivity, self-diffusion, and proton spin-lattice relaxation in terms of the migration of defects within the ice I structure. As explained in articles by Onsager, Runnels, and others, these defects are generally viewed as being of three types. The first are the orientational defects first proposed by Bjerrum to account for dielectric polarization and relaxation. These are formed when an H_2O molecule rotates about one of its O-H. . .O bonds to create one O-H H-O bond with two intervening hydrogen atoms (D-defect) and one O. . .O bond with no intervening hydrogen atom (L-defect). Second, there are the ionic defects that are formed when a molecule ionizes to H_3O^+ and OH^-. Finally, there are interstitial molecules that are probably responsible for self-diffusion and the spin-lattice relaxation. The detailed atomic structure of the defects, the kinetics of their migration, and the relation of the kinetics to observed properties are all active topics of research.

Other subjects discussed at the symposium include radiation chemistry (two papers), mechanical properties (seven), lattice dynamics (two), thermal phenomena (five), glaciology and meteorology (six), and hydrogen bonding (four). The papers on hydrogen bonding give a wider scope to the volume, and serve as a reminder that the chief importance of research on ice is that ice is a model substance for the study of hydrogen bonds. There are as many hydrogen bonds in ice as covalent bonds, and whatever can be learned about them in this relatively simple substance is of enormous help in understanding the properties of liquid water, biological molecules, and the vast number of other compounds that contain hydrogen bonds.

DAVID EISENBERG
Department of Chemistry and Molecular Biology Institute,
University of California, Los Angeles

Books Received

Advances in Librarianship. Vol. 1. Melvin J. Voigt, Ed. Academic Press, New York, 1970. xvi + 296 pp. $15.

Advances in Organic Geochemistry. Proceedings of the third international congress, London, September 1966. G. D. Hobson and G. C. Speers, Eds. Pergamon, New York, 1970. x + 578 pp. + plates. $21. International Series of Monographs in Earth Sciences, vol. 32.

Chemistry of Sphingolipids. David Shapiro. Hermann, Paris, 1969. 112 pp. Paper, 30 F. Chemistry of Natural Products (Original Series), vol. 9. Actualités scientifiques et industrielles, No. 1338.

The Children of Frankenstein. A Primer on Modern Technology and Human Values. Herbert J. Muller. Indiana University Press, Bloomington, 1970. xvi + 432 pp. $10.

Eocene and Oligocene Foraminifera from the Santa Cruz Mountains, California. W. W. Fairchild, P. R. Wesenduck, and D. W. Weaver. University of California Press, Berkeley, 1969. vi + 146 pp., illus. + chart. Paper, $3.50. University of California Publications in Geological Sciences, vol. 81.

The Eocene Green River Flora of Northwestern Colorado and Northeastern Utah. H. D. MacGinitie. University of California Press, Berkeley, 1969. vi + 204 pp., illus. Paper, $4. University of California Publications in Geological Sciences, vol. 83.

Fundamental Concepts in Drug-Receptor Interactions. Proceedings of the Third Buffalo-Milan Symposium on Molecular Pharmacology, Buffalo, N.Y., August 1968. J. F. Danielli, J. F. Moran, and D. J. Triggle, Eds. Academic Press, New York, 1970. x + 262 pp., illus. $15.

A Genetics Program Library. Newton E. Morton, Ed. University of Hawaii Press, Honolulu, 1969. viii + 64 pp. $6.

Growth, Equality, and the Mexican Experience. Morris Singer. Published for the Institute of Latin American Studies by the University of Texas Press, Austin, 1969. xii + 344 pp. $8.50. Latin American Monographs, No. 16.

Human Perception. R. H. Day. Wiley, New York, 1969. xiv + 196 pp., illus. Paper, $3.25. Basic Topics in Psychology.

The Human Thymus. Gideon Goldstein and Ian R. Mackay. Green, St. Louis, 1969. xvi + 352 pp., illus. $12.

Hunting for Dinosaurs. Zofia Kielan-Jaworowska. Translated from the Polish. M.I.T. Press, Cambridge, Mass., 1969. xiv + 178 pp., illus. $7.95.

The Huron. Farmers of the North. Bruce G. Trigger. Holt, Rinehart and Winston, New York, 1969. xii + 132 pp., illus. Paper, $2.25. Case Studies in Cultural Anthropology.

Introduction to Physical Geography. Arthur N. Strahler. Wiley, New York, ed. 2, 1970. x + 470 pp. + plates. $9.95.

Investigations in General Biology. Kenneth B. Armitage. Academic Press, New York, 1970. x + 212 pp., illus. Paper, $4.50.

Irascible Genius. The Life of Charles Babbage. Maboth Moseley. Regnery, Chicago, ed. 2, 1970. 288 pp. + plates. $6.95.

The Legislation of Morality. Law, Drugs, and Moral Judgment. Troy Duster. Free Press, New York, 1970. x + 276 pp. $6.95.

Liquid Crystals and Their Applications. Thomas Kallard, Ed. Optosonic Press, New York, 1970. viii + 220 pp., illus. Paper, $12. State of the Art Review, No. 2.

Mammalia. Jean Ingles, John Fitzgibbon, Hazel Bartlett, and Michael Dadd. Zoological Society of London, London, 1969. vi + 378 pp. Paper, $8.40. Zoological Record, vol. 103, section 19, 1966.

The Physiological Mechanisms of Cerebral Blood Circulation. A. I. Naumenko and N. N. Benua. Translated from the Russian and edited by Josef Brožek and Ernst Simonson. With the assistance of Margaret Maria Brožek. Thomas, Springfield, Ill., 1970. xviii + 126 pp., illus. $8.75.

The Plant Hunters. Being an examination of collecting with an account of the careers and the methods of a number of those who have searched the world for wild plants. Tyler Whittle. Chilton, Philadelphia, 1970. xii + 284 pp. + plates. $8.95.

Practical Invertebrate Zoology. A laboratory Manual for the Study of the Major Groups of Invertebrates, Excluding Protochordates. F. E. G. Cox, R. Phillips Dales, J. Green, J. E. Morton, D. Nichols, and D. Wakelin. R. Phillips Dales, Ed. University of Washington Press, Seattle, 1970. xii + 356 pp., illus. $9.50. Biology Series.

Principles of Climatology. A Manual in Earth Science. Hans Neuberger and John Cahir. Holt, Rinehart, and Winston, New York, 1969. xiv + 178 pp., illus. Paper, $3.95.

Reagents for Organic Synthesis. Vol. 2. Mary Fieser and Louis Fieser. Wiley-Interscience, New York, 1969. x + 542 pp., illus. $17.50.

Research and the Individual. Human Studies. Henry K. Beecher. Little, Brown, Boston, 1970. xxii + 362 pp. $15.50.

Research Methods in Plant Science. Richard M. and Deana T. Klein. Published for the American Museum of Natural History by Natural History Press, Garden City, N.Y., 1970. xii + 756 pp., illus. $20.

Science in Archaeology. A Survey of Progress and Research. Don Brothwell and Eric Higgs, Eds. Praeger, New York, ed. 2, 1970. 720 pp. + plates. $22.50.

Science in France in the Revolutionary Era. Described by Thomas Bugge, Danish Astronomer Royal and Member of the International Commission on the Metric System (1798–1799). Maurice P. Crosland, Ed. Society for the History of Technology and M.I.T. Press, Cambridge, Mass., 1969. xvi + 240 pp. $10. Society for the History of Technology Monograph Series, No. 7.

Sisal. Thirty Years' Sisal Research in Tanzania. G. W. Lock. Humanities Press, New York; Longmans, London, ed. 2, 1969. xxii + 366 pp. + plates. $9.

Sociological Approach to Religion. Louis Schneider. Wiley, New York, 1970. x + 198 pp. $5.95.

Volcanic History of Honduras. Howel Williams and A. R. McBirney. University of California Press, Berkeley, 1969. viii + 104 pp., illus. + maps. Paper, $3.50. University of California Publications in Geological Sciences, vol. 85.

White Racism. A Psychohistory. Joel Kovel. Pantheon, New York, 1970. xiv + 306 pp. $7.95.

Writing the Biomedical Research Paper. Stanley M. Garn. Thomas, Springfield, Ill., 1970. viii + 68 pp. Paper, $3.

The Yoruba of Southwestern Nigeria. William Bascom. Holt, Rinehart and Winston, New York, 1969. xxii + 122 pp., illus. Paper, $2.25. Case Studies in Cultural Anthropology.